INTRODUCTION

BACKGROUND: 2006–2011

All too often, discussions of the relationship between Iran and its Arab and non-Arab neighbors have been reduced to a competition between Sunni and Shia Islam. Sect does play a role, but as our surveys over the past decade make clear, the factors contributing to attitudes toward Iran are complex, including: reactions to U.S. and Israeli policies and how Arabs have compared their governments’ and Iran’s reactions to those policies; Iran’s own behavior in the region; perceptions of Iran’s ambitions; and issues of culture and heritage.

In 2006, for example, with the region inflamed by U.S. behaviors in Iraq and U.S. support for Israel’s 2006 attack on Gaza and invasion of Lebanon, Arab attitudes toward the United States were at a low point. In contrast, Arab public sympathy with Hezbollah and, by extension, with Iran, was at a high point. If sect were the sole factor in determining Arab attitudes toward Iran, how does one explain the extraordinarily favorable ratings given to Hezbollah’s leader and Iran’s president in Saudi Arabia in 2008? In March of that year, when asked to name “the world leader you admire most (not from your country),” 21% of Saudis named Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, 13% named Syria’s President Bashar al Assad, and 12% named Iran’s President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

A few years later, Arab perceptions of Iran had changed. In our 2011 survey of Morocco, Lebanon, Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and UAE, we noted a significant decline in the favorable ratings Arab opinion gave to Iran. Observing this, we conducted a more in-depth study in the same six countries and found in most of them real concern with Iran’s policies in Iraq, Bahrain, and the Arab Gulf region. Only in Lebanon was there support for Iranian policy.

In that same 2011 survey, in contrast to the 2008 poll, only 4% of Saudis gave the Iranian president a favorable rating and only 5% supported Assad’s role in Syria.

ATTITUDES TODAY: 2012

In an effort to learn more, this year we conducted our most extensive survey of attitudes toward Iran. In all, we covered 20 countries: 17 Arab countries (Morocco, Algeria, Libya, Tunisia, Egypt, Sudan, Palestine, Lebanon, Jordan, Iraq, Kuwait, Qatar, Bahrain, UAE, Oman, Yemen, and Saudi Arabia) and three non-Arab countries (Turkey, Azerbaijan, and Pakistan). The study covered four principal areas of inquiry:

I. General Attitudes toward Iran and the Iranian Revolution

II. Attitudes toward Iranian policies in several Arab countries and a comparison of Iran’s regional role with that of other important international actors

III. Attitudes toward the Iranian people, Iran’s culture and its contributions to Islamic civilization

IV. Attitudes toward Iran’s nuclear program

Because the poll was so extensive and the data so rich, we divided the report into four regional groups:

- The Gulf and the Arabian Peninsula States: Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, UAE, Saudi Arabia, Oman, and Yemen
- The Middle East: Lebanon, Iraq, Jordan, and Palestine
- The Maghreb, Egypt, and Sudan: Morocco, Algeria, Libya, Tunisia, Egypt, and Sudan
- Non-Arab Muslim Neighbors: Turkey, Pakistan, and Azerbaijan

Because there is a measurable sectarian divide that can be observed in some, though not all, of these countries, we include a comparison of Sunni and Shia attitudes where they are relevant. Before examining the results, in detail, the following general observations can be made:

I. ATTITUDES TOWARD IRAN

1. Iran is now viewed unfavorably in 14 of the 20 countries covered in this study. It is only viewed favorably in Yemen, Kuwait, Lebanon, Iraq, Algeria, and Libya. In countries where there is a measurable Shia community, there is a deep divide in views regarding Iran, except in Yemen and Lebanon where both Sunni and Shia have generally favorable views toward Iran, and in Azerbaijan, where both groups have largely negative views of Iran. (See Table 1.)
2. Does Iran provide a “good model” to follow? In only three countries do majorities say “yes”: Lebanon, Pakistan, and Iraq. Pluralities in Kuwait and Bahrain concur, while majorities in 11 countries say “no,” with the remaining four displaying mixed attitudes. By contrast, the UAE is considered a “good model” to follow by majorities or pluralities in 16 of the 19 countries (UAE excluded). Only Kuwait, Morocco, and Turkey disagree that the UAE is a “good model” to follow. (See Table 2.)
3. “Did the 1979 Iranian Revolution make the region more or less stable?” Most countries say “less stable” with only Lebanon and Iraq saying that revolutionary Iran contributed to making the region “more stable.” (See Table 6.)
4. In the 2009 clashes between the government and the “Green Movement,” only Yemen, Lebanon, Iraq, Algeria, and Libya side with the government of Iran. Opinion in the other 15 countries is decidedly on the side of the “Green Movement.” (See Table 3.)

II. IRAN’S POLICIES

1. When asked specifically whether Iran is playing a positive or negative role in Iraq, Lebanon, Syria, Bahrain, and the Arab Gulf region – there is widespread agreement that Iran’s role in each is negative. The only exceptions are Iraq and Lebanon, which are supportive of Iran’s role in every area, and Jordan and Yemen which both give mixed reviews of Iran's role in Lebanon. (See Table 4.)

2. When asked whether "Iran is working to promote peace and stability in the region," only majorities in Yemen, Lebanon, Iraq, and Libya say "yes." Kuwaitis are divided in their attitudes along sectarian lines. In all of the other 15 countries, the answer is "no." (See Table 5.)
3. Majorities in every country with the exception of Yemen, Lebanon, Iraq, and Algeria agree that Iran is contributing to sectarian division in the Arab World. (See Table 5.)

III. IRAN'S CULTURE AND CONTRIBUTION TO ISLAMIC CIVILIZATION

1. Are Iranians "good, religious people," "hardworking people," and "people like me"? Attitudes are negative in every area in Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Palestine, Sudan, Morocco, Tunisia, Azerbaijan, and Turkey. The negative views in Bahrain and Turkey show a deep sectarian divide, with Shia expressing significantly more favorable views about Iranian people than their Sunni compatriots. The only countries where overall attitudes are consistently positive are Lebanon, Iraq, and Libya. In the other eight countries, attitudes are largely mixed. (See Table 8.)
2. Has Iran made positive contributions to Islam? Only Lebanon, Iraq, Libya, and Pakistan answer "yes." (See Table 8.)
3. Which is more "generous" and "knowledgeable" – Arab or Iranian culture? There is near consensus that Arab culture wins on both counts. The only exceptions to this consensus are Yemeni and Bahraini Shia. (See Table 10.)
4. Which culture is the more violent? Most countries surveyed say that the Iranians are more violent. The only country holding a different view is Libya. (See Table 10.)
5. Only Yemen, Lebanon, Iraq, Libya, and Algeria say that their countries have positive relations with Iran. Pakistanis and Palestinians are split on the question. And when asked if their country should have closer ties with Iran? In addition to majorities in Yemen, Lebanon, Iraq, Libya, and Algeria, about one half of Saudis and Bahrainis also agree. Majorities in the other 13 countries appear to be satisfied with the current cool relations with Iran. (See Table 8.)
6. Iran as the dominant power in the Gulf? Only Yemenis, Lebanese, and Iraqis agree with this proposition. In most countries there is a deep sectarian divide on this question. The only Shia communities to hold that Iran should not be a dominant power in the Gulf are the Shia in the UAE, Kuwait, and Azerbaijan. (See Table 12.)

IV. THE NUCLEAR QUESTION

1. Most countries agree that the Middle East would be more secure if it were a Nuclear Free Zone. The only countries that believe that the Middle East would be more secure if Iran had a nuclear weapon are Yemen and Libya. Iraqis and Algerians are divided on this issue. Only Shia in Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Lebanon, and Turkey say the Middle East would be more secure if Iran had a nuclear weapon. Shia Muslims in all other countries agree with their Sunni compatriots. (See Table 11.)
2. Almost all agree that the Arab Gulf region states are right to be concerned with Iran's nuclear program. Only Lebanese and Iraqis disagree. (See Table 12.)
3. Back in 2006, we surveyed opinion in Saudi Arabia, UAE, Kuwait, Egypt, Morocco, Jordan, Turkey, and Pakistan asking whether they believed that Iran's nuclear program was for peaceful purposes or if it was intended to produce a nuclear weapon. At that point only Turks suspected that Iran had ambition to produce a weapon and Egyptians were divided on the question. Strong majorities in all the other countries believed that Iran's program was intended for peaceful purposes. In our current survey there has been a significant turnabout, with strong majorities in all of the above countries now believing that Iran has ambitions to produce a weapon. Of all of the new countries added to the survey, only Lebanon believes that Iran intends its program for peaceful purposes, with Libyans divided on the question. (See Table 13.)
4. What should the response be if Iran persists with its nuclear program? Majorities in every country except Yemen, Lebanon, Iraq, Morocco, Algeria, and Libya support economic sanctions against Iran. There is no country in which a strong majority supports military action against Iran to stop its nuclear program. Pluralities in divided Turkey and Azerbaijan would support such military action. Palestinians are divided on this question. This opposition exists whether the military action is endorsed by a majority vote in the United Nations or taken unilaterally. The only subgroups to support military action are Sunnis in Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, and Azerbaijan. Once again though, it is useful to consider the shifts in opinion that have occurred since 2006 on the matter of military action. (See Tables 14 and 15.)

Support for military strikes if used against Iran's nuclear facilities and authorized by international consensus
	UAE	KSA	Kuwait	Egypt	Morocco	Jordan	Pakistan	Turkey
2006	5	6	3	15	14	0	11	27
2012	29	36	17	39	26	34	29	51

THE BOTTOM LINE

1. There is a growing antipathy toward Iran across the Arab World and among Iran's non-Arab neighbors.
2. Iran's unfavorable ratings appear to be driven by its policies in Iraq, Syria, the Arab Gulf region, in general, and by its nuclear program.
3. Most Arab Muslims, of all sects, see their Arab culture as superior to the culture of Iran. They see themselves as more generous and knowledgeable, less violent, and as having made a more significant contribution to Islamic civilization.
4. Iran has made serious inroads into the region's Shia population, especially in Bahrain, Iraq, Yemen, and Saudi Arabia.
5. There is near consensus that the region should be a "nuclear free zone" and deep concern with Iran's nuclear program. There is strong support in most countries for internationally imposed sanctions to deter Iran's program. While majorities everywhere but Turkey oppose any military strikes against Iran should they continue to develop a nuclear capacity, the percentage of those who would support military strikes has increased since 2006, with a deep division among Sunni and Shia communities on this question. A majority of Sunnis in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, and Azerbaijan would support the military option.

Of the Gulf and Arabian Peninsula states surveyed, only Yemen (80%) and Kuwait (50%) have a majority with a favorable attitude toward Iran. Unfavorable attitudes are highest in Saudi Arabia (84%) and Qatar (79%). Across the Gulf, Shia attitudes toward Iran are dramatically more favorable than Sunni attitudes. In Yemen, both Shia (94%) and Sunni (73%) respondents have favorable views toward Iran.

The United Nations is only viewed favorably by majority of those in Qatar (71%) and Kuwait (60%), while less than one-third of respondents in all other Gulf region states surveyed have favorable attitudes toward the U.N. The Arab League is similarly favored by a majority of those in Qatar (63%) and Kuwait (62%), as well as Yemen (51%), while less than four in ten respondents in the other Gulf region countries have favorable attitudes of the Arab League.

More than six in ten respondents in Qatar (64%) and Saudi Arabia (62%) have favorable attitudes toward the United States. While opinion is evenly split in Kuwait (49% fav/49% unfav), solid majorities in all other Gulf region states surveyed have unfavorable attitudes toward the United States, including UAE (28% fav/69% unfav), Yemen (34% fav/65% unfav), Bahrain (30% fav/63% unfav), and Oman (37% fav/54% unfav). Attitudes of Sunni and Shia are not widely divergent in Kuwait, Bahrain, and Oman. However, Yemeni Shia are twice as likely as Yemeni Sunni to view the U.S. favorably, while in Saudi Arabia and UAE, Sunni respondents are far more likely to view the U.S. favorably than Shia respondents.

At least two-thirds of respondents in the Gulf region countries surveyed have favorable opinions of Saudi Arabia, with the exception of Bahrain where just 34% of respondents say they have a favorable attitude regarding Saudi Arabia. The favorability ratings of Sunni and Shia respondents are fairly consistent except in UAE where 88% of Sunni and just 32% of Shia view Saudi Arabia favorably and in Bahrain where 55% of Sunni and just 14% of Shia view Saudi Arabia favorably.

A majority in all Gulf region states have favorable attitudes regarding Egypt, with the highest favorability rating in Saudi Arabia (83%) and the lowest in Qatar (54%) and UAE (51%). Again, these views are fairly even among Shia and Sunni respondents in most countries, though Saudi Sunni respondents are twice as likely as Shia respondents to view Egypt favorably (90% vs. 48%) while Sunni respondents in UAE are less likely than their Shia counterparts to view Egypt favorably (50% vs. 69%).

Majorities of respondents in Yemen (76%), Saudi Arabia (71%), Oman (66%), Kuwait (63%), and UAE (58%) view Turkey favorably. Opinion is evenly split in Bahrain (48% vs. 45%) and Qatar (49% vs. 48%). Sunni respondents are more likely to hold favorable attitudes regarding Turkey than Shia respondents in Saudi Arabia (83% vs. 5%), UAE (63% vs. 10%), and Bahrain (58% vs. 38%).

Among respondents in Lebanon and Iraq, strong majorities (84% and 61%, respectively) have favorable attitudes regarding Iran. The views of Lebanese respondents are somewhat divided based on sect, with Lebanese Shia being the most partial to Iran (96% favorable vs. 81% of Christians and 75% of Sunnis). Iraqis are more significantly split along sectarian lines, with 82% of Iraqi Shia having favorable opinions and 82% of Iraqi Sunnis having unfavorable opinions of Iran. Only about one-quarter of respondents in Palestine (26%) and Jordan (23%) have favorable attitudes toward Iran.

Attitudes regarding the United States are quite negative, with less than one-quarter of respondents in all four countries responding favorably, including just 2% of those in Palestine. The United Kingdom is also viewed unfavorably by strong majorities in all countries, with less than one-third holding favorable views.

Saudi Arabia is viewed favorably by 81% of those in Jordan, 74% of those in Palestine, 54% of those in Iraq, and just 34% of those in Lebanon. In Iraq, these views are decidedly split along sectarian lines with 90% of Iraqi Sunnis and 37% of Iraqi Shia having favorable attitudes regarding Saudi Arabia.

Majorities in all four countries have favorable attitudes toward Egypt, with more than three-quarters of those in Jordan (76%) and Palestine (78%) viewing Egypt favorably. Turkey is also seen favorably by strong majorities in Jordan (68%) and Palestine (83%), while slim majorities in Lebanon (50%) and Iraq (55%) have unfavorable attitudes regarding Turkey.

Of the six North African countries surveyed, in just two, Algeria and Libya, majorities have favorable attitudes regarding Iran (58% and 61%, respectively). Favorable opinions of Iran are held by 44% of those in Morocco, 38% in Sudan, 34% in Egypt, and 31% in Tunisia.

There is a wide range of opinions on the United Nations, with Libyan respondents the most positive (62% favorable) and Egyptians the most negative (just 4% favorable).

Respondents in Libya and Algeria are the most favorable toward the United States (47% and 44%, respectively). Less than one quarter of respondents in the other North African nations surveyed view the United States favorably, including just 13% of Moroccans and 10% of Egyptians.

Egyptians are, however, the most favorable with regard to the United Kingdom (63%); Algerians and Sudanese are evenly split on the U.K. And just 22% of those in Morocco, Libya, and Tunisia have favorable attitudes regarding the United Kingdom.

Majorities in all six North African nations surveyed view Saudi Arabia favorably, most notably 94% of Egyptians and 82% of Sudanese. Morocco (56%) and Tunisia (55%) are the least enthusiastic about Saudi Arabia. Egypt is also viewed favorably by solid majorities in all six nations, including 87% of Libyans. Opinion is more mixed with respect to Turkey. While respondents in Egypt (89%), Algeria (80%), Tunisia (78%), and Sudan (64%) have generally favorable attitudes regarding Turkey, just 48% of Moroccan respondents and 34% of Libyan respondents concur.

Less than one quarter of respondents in Pakistan, Turkey, and Azerbaijan view Iran favorably (24%, 22%, and 20%, respectively). There is a significant split on Iran between Sunni and Shia respondents in Pakistan (85% Sunni unfavorable vs. 94% Shia favorable) and in Turkey (88% Sunni unfavorable vs. 92% Shia favorable).

Opinions regarding the United States are abysmal. Just 33% of respondents in Turkey and 27% of respondents in Azerbaijan hold favorable attitudes regarding the United States, but not even one respondent in Pakistan views the United States favorably and 94% have unfavorable attitudes regarding the U.S. Attitudes toward the United Kingdom are also quite negative in Pakistan (6% favorable) and Turkey (14% favorable), but a plurality of respondents in Azerbaijan (48%) hold a favorable attitude regarding the U.K.

Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Turkey are viewed positively by very strong majorities in Turkey, Pakistan, and Azerbaijan. Pakistan is the most favorable toward both Saudi Arabia (92%) and Egypt (88%).

ATTITUDES TOWARD IRAN

When asked for the first word that comes to mind when they think of Iran, respondents in all countries are most likely to give responses related to Iranian policy issues, rather than cultural or religious responses. And, in most countries surveyed, there is a clear positive-negative divide between Shia and Sunni respondents.

Among the countries with significant Shia populations, sectarian division around top-of-mind policy issues are most prevalent in Saudi Arabia (Sunni: 71% negative vs. Shia: 53% positive), Pakistan (Sunni: 42% negative vs. Shia: 67% positive), Bahrain (Sunni: 49% negative vs. Shia: 37% positive), Kuwait (Sunni: 42% negative vs. Shia: 38% positive), and UAE (Sunni: 24% negative vs. Shia: 54% positive). For example, in Saudi Arabia, Sunni respondents say things like Iran seeks global conflict and wants to occupy other neighboring countries, while Shia respondents say Iran is a strong nation and shows courage in difficult situations. In Pakistan, Sunni respondents mention oppression and corruption, while Shia respondents talk about Iranian strength.

There is no sectarian divide on top-of-mind issues in Yemen and Lebanon, where such responses are generally positive and in Turkey and Azerbaijan, where responses are generally negative. In Yemen and Lebanon, majorities of Sunni and Shia respondents (Yemen: 56% and 83%; Lebanon: 56% and 65%) think of positive policy issues when they first think of Iran; for example, Iran is a superpower, has strong ties with Arab countries, and has strong defense forces. In Turkey, regardless of sect (44% Sunni and 40% Shia), responses about Iranian policy are quite negative including: Iran wants the nuclear weapons to control the whole world; pursue policy of abductions and massacres; and terrorist country. In Azerbaijan, Sunni (45%) and Shia (36%) respondents are more likely to view Iranian culture negatively, saying things like arrogance and paranoia.

In Iraq, Sunni respondents are generally negative with respect to Iranian culture (33%) noting, for example, a lack of respect for others; Iraqi Sunnis are divided on Iranian policy with 26% giving positive top-of-mind responses related to policy and 22% giving negative responses. A majority of Iraqi Shia respondents (53%), however, think of positive policy issues, like working on building a strong nation, when they first think of Iran.

Among countries with small Shia populations, a majority of respondents give negative top-of-mind responses related to policy, culture, and religion in all countries except Libya. The strongest negative views come from Tunisia (26% positive vs. 73% negative), Jordan (30% positive vs. 68% negative), and Palestine (32% positive vs. 65% negative). In Libya, 64% of respondents say something positive about Iran, including aspects of Iranian culture like respect for self-determination and focus on technological development for progress, while 35% say something negative.

A majority of respondents in Yemen (58%), Saudi Arabia (51%), Oman (51%), and Qatar (50%), as well as a strong plurality in Bahrain (47%), consider UAE as a good model for development and progress. Only in Kuwait is a majority opposed to seeing UAE as a model for their country (33% good vs. 50% not a good model).

A plurality of respondents in Kuwait (44%) and Bahrain (46%) consider Iran a good model for development and progress, with a deep sectarian divide evident in both countries (Kuwait: 17% Sunni vs. 79% Shia; Bahrain: 19% Sunni vs. 72% Shia). Opinion with respect to seeing Iran as a model in the other Gulf region states is either mixed (e.g., Yemen: 43% good vs. 42% not good) or negative, particularly in Saudi Arabia (16% good vs. 67% not good) and UAE (20% good vs. 56% not good).

Majorities of Lebanese and Iraqi respondents consider Iran to be a good model for their countries (Lebanon: 77%, Iraq: 71%). While Lebanese opinion about the Iranian model is not divided by sect, Iraqi opinion is clearly divided with just 31% of Sunni respondents saying Iran is a good model compared with 89% of Shia respondents who think so.

Majorities of Lebanese and Iraqis view all the other options presented as good models for development and progress too. In Lebanon, UAE (81%) and Qatar (80%) are most favored. Iraqi respondents also view Qatar (88%) as a good model, though only a slim majority considers UAE a good model for their country (51%).

Views about good models for development are very similar in Jordan and Palestine; UAE and Turkey are the most favored models for both Jordanians (UAE: 67%, Turkey: 60%) and Palestinians (UAE: 69%, Turkey: 70%). Just 38% in Jordan and 32% in Palestine consider Iran a good model for their countries.

Majorities in all the North African countries surveyed, except Libya, feel Iran is not a good model for development and progress, with Egypt (75%) and Sudan (65%) the most opposed to an Iranian model. In Libya, 36% of respondents do consider Iran a good model, while 34% do not.

Majorities of respondents in Libya (66%), Egypt (60%), Tunisia (55%), and Sudan (54%) feel UAE is a good model for their country. A plurality in Algeria agrees (44%); however, 57% of Moroccan respondents say that UAE is not a good model for their country. In addition, majorities or pluralities in all North African countries consider Turkey a good model, including 72% of Sudanese, 67% of Moroccans, and 63% of Tunisians.

Egypt is only favored by a majority in Libya (76%) as a model for development and progress. There was little support for Qatar as a model, with less than one third of respondents saying it is a good model for their country.

Respondents in Turkey strongly reject any other country as a model for their development and progress. Pakistanis, on the other hand, find all the options presented as good models, including UAE (86%), Egypt (83%), Turkey (79%), and notably Iran (72%). Only UAE is considered a good model by a majority in Azerbaijan (55%), though 44% feel Turkey’s model could be copied by their country.

Lebanese respondents strongly identify with the Iranian government (83%) rather than the “Green Movement” (16%). A majority in Iraq also side with the government (58%); a clear sectarian divide is evident in these responses with 73% of Iraqi Shia respondents siding with the Iranian government compared with just 26% of Iraqi Sunni respondents who identify with the government. At least two-thirds of Jordanian (70%) and Palestinian (67%) respondents identify with the “Green Movement” rather than the Iranian government.

Respondents in the Gulf region view Iran's role as negative in Iraq, Lebanon, Syria, Bahrain, and the Arab Gulf region. In each case, about 50% of respondents in Kuwait and Bahrain say Iran's role is negative, while about two-thirds of respondents in Oman and UAE see Iran as playing a negative role in each country and the region. Saudi and Qatari respondents are the most negative, with about three-quarters of these respondents saying Iran plays a negative role. Pluralities of Yemeni respondents agree that Iran's role is negative in Iraq, Syria, Bahrain, and the Arab Gulf region; however, 43% of Yemeni respondents say Iran's role in Lebanon is positive (compared to 33% who say it is negative).

In every country except Oman and Yemen, there is a huge disparity between the opinions of Shia and Sunni respondents on these questions, with Shia respondents overwhelmingly viewing Iran's impact as positive and Sunni respondents overwhelmingly seeing it as negative.

Perceptions of Iran's impact on individual countries tend to mirror respondents' overall favorable or unfavorable attitudes toward Iran. At least two-thirds of Lebanese respondents view Iran's impact as positive in Lebanon (85%), Iraq (75%), Syria (72%), Bahrain (70%), and the Arab Gulf region (67%), while less than two in ten feel Iran's impact is negative in these areas. Shia respondents in Lebanon are most likely to see Iran's impact as positive, but majorities of Sunni and Christians concur in all cases. In Iraq, about 60% of respondents view Iran's impact as positive in these regions, while about 30% consider it negative. These opinions are very lopsided with respect to sect, with Shia respondents overwhelmingly viewing Iran as positively impactful and Sunni respondents seeing Iran's impact as negative.

In Jordan and Palestine, views are quite different, with less than 20% seeing Iran's impact positively and more than 70% seeing it as negative, except with regard to Lebanon (Jordan: 47% positive vs. 48% negative; Palestine: 39% positive vs. 56% negative).

In North Africa, respondents tend to view Iran's impact as negative; in fact, less than one quarter of respondents see Iran's impact as positive in almost all cases except with respect to Lebanon. In that case, 51% of Libyan respondents, 38% in Morocco, 37% in Sudan, and 29% in Algeria view Iran's impact as positive.

Iran’s impact is viewed as negative by wide margins in all cases by respondents in Turkey, Pakistan, and Azerbaijan. While both Sunni and Shia Azerbaijanis are in agreement, and Turkish respondents are only somewhat divided with respect to sect on these questions, there is a wide disparity between Sunni and Shia respondents in Pakistan on these questions, with Shia respondents overwhelmingly saying that Iran’s impact is positive in all cases, and Sunni respondents saying the opposite.

Majorities in all the Gulf region countries except Yemen say Iran is not a role model for their country, and that Iranian policy is contributing to sectarian division in the Arab World. At least three-quarters of respondents in Saudi Arabia and Qatar hold these views, the most adamant on these two points. In Yemen, however, 55% of respondents say Iran is a role model for their country and 73% disagree that Iranian policy is contributing to sectarian division in the Arab World. While significant sectarian divides are evident in Bahrain, UAE, and Saudi Arabia on these questions, there is considerably less division in Yemen, Oman, and Kuwait, particularly with respect to Iran's contribution to sectarian division.

Solid majorities in all countries say Iran is pursuing its own agenda to serve its interests, with Saudis again holding the strongest opinion (89%), followed by Qatar (74%) and Kuwait (73%).

Majorities in Saudi Arabia (80%), Qatar (78%), UAE (60%), Oman (58%), and Bahrain (50%) say that Iran is not working to promote peace and stability in the region; opinion in Kuwait is split (47% vs. 43%), largely on sectarian lines with 82% of Shia respondents saying Iran is promoting peace and stability while 71% of Sunni respondents disagree.

By way of comparison, the United States is viewed as contributing to peace and stability in the Arab World by majorities in UAE (81%), Saudi Arabia (74%), Qatar (74%), Kuwait (66%), Bahrain (61%), and Yemen (53%), while Omani respondents are split on this question (46% vs. 48%). Majorities in all the Gulf region countries except Bahrain also see Saudi Arabia and Turkey as positively impacting peace and stability in the region. Views on Russia's contribution are mixed.

About eight in ten respondents in Lebanon and six in ten respondents in Iraq feel that Iran is a role model for their country (Leb: 87%, Iraq: 60%) and that Iran is working to promote peace and stability in the region (Leb: 79%, Iraq: 63%). These respondents also do not believe that Iran is pursuing its own agenda to serve its interests (Leb: 78%, Iraq: 63%), nor that Iranian policy is contributing to sectarian divide in the Arab World (Leb: 81%, Iraq: 63%). While in Iraq these views are deeply divided along sectarian lines, in Lebanon Sunni, Shia, and Christian respondents have remarkably similar opinions.

Opinions in Jordan and Palestine are exactly opposite to those in Lebanon and Iraq, with more than two-thirds of respondents in both countries disagreeing that Iran is a role model for their country (Jor: 72%, Pal: 65%) and that Iran is working for peace and stability (Jor: 75%, Pal: 69%), and agreeing that Iran is pursuing its own agenda (Jor: 76%, Pal: 67%) and that Iranian policy contributes to sectarian division (Jor: 78%, Pal: 72%).

Majorities in Jordan (83%) and Palestine (65%) believe that the United States contributes to peace and stability in the region, while majorities in Lebanon (64%) and Iraq (56%) disagree. Respondents in Jordan and Palestine also feel that Saudi Arabia and Turkey make a positive contribution to peace and stability; a majority in Iraq agrees with respect to Saudi Arabia, while a majority in Lebanon agrees with respect to Turkey. All four countries agree that Russia does not contribute to peace and stability in the Arab World.

Majorities of respondents in the North African nations surveyed are generally in agreement that Iran is not a role model for their country, that Iran is not working to promote peace and stability in the region, that Iran is pursuing its own agenda to serve its interests, and that Iranian policy contributes to sectarian division in the Arab World. The only exceptions are that a majority of Libyans feel that Iran is in fact working to promote peace and stability (64%) and that Iran is not pursuing its own agenda for its own interests (59%). In addition, a majority of Algerian respondents (56%) do not agree that Iranian policy contributes to sectarian discord.

Opinions are mixed in Libya, Tunisia, Egypt, and Sudan with regard to the U.S. contribution to peace and stability in the region, while a majority in Algeria (68%) believes that the United States makes a positive contribution and a majority in Morocco disagrees (63%). All these countries agree that Saudi Arabia positively contributes to peace and stability in the Arab World and that Russia does not. Egypt (87%), Algeria (74%), Sudan (71%), and Tunisia (70%) feel Turkey makes a positive contribution, while Moroccans are split and Libyans disagree.

Strong majorities in Turkey, Pakistan, and Azerbaijan disagree that Iran is a role model and that Iran is working to promote peace and stability, and agree that Iran is pursuing its own interests and agenda and that Iranian policy contributes to sectarian division.

They all strongly agree that Turkey and Saudi Arabia contribute to peace and stability in the Arab World, and that Russia does not. Opinion with respect to the United States' contribution is mixed, with Pakistan (79%) and Azerbaijan (59%) strongly agreeing that the U.S. makes a contribution and Turkey strongly disagreeing (84%).

In all 20 countries surveyed, strong majorities – to unanimity in some cases – are concerned that sectarian division is growing across the region.

Among Gulf and Arabian Peninsula nations, Yemen (85%) and Saudi Arabia (82%) express the most concern, with Oman (68%) and UAE (65%) conveying the least, though still substantial, concern. There is unanimous concern in Lebanon and near unanimity in Iraq (97%), Palestine (89%), and Jordan (87%). In North Africa, more than two-thirds of respondents express concern over sectarian division in the region, with the most concern conveyed in Libya (91%), Algeria (86%), Sudan (86%), and Egypt (83%). Finally, there is unanimous concern in Pakistan and very high levels of concern in Turkey (83%) and Azerbaijan (79%).

When asked if Iranians are “good, religious people,” “hard-working people,” and “people just like me,” respondents in Bahrain, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia are negative on all three questions, with 70% of Saudis disagreeing that “Iranians are people just like me” and 66% of Qataris disagreeing that “Iranians are good, religious people.” In Bahrain, these negative views are highly correlated with Sunni respondents, while Shia respondents tend to express far more favorable views of the Iranian people.

A majority of Yemeni respondents (76%) say “Iranians are good, religious people,” while majorities of respondents in UAE (62%) and Oman (50%) disagree, and opinion in Kuwait is evenly split. All four of these countries, however, agree that “Iranians are hard-working people” (Yemen: 78%, UAE: 53%, Kuwait: 50%, Oman: 48%). Respondents in Kuwait (56%), UAE (56%), and Oman (52%) also agree that “Iranians are people just like me,” while 62% of Yemeni respondents disagree.

At least six in ten respondents in all the Gulf region states say that Iranians have not made a positive contribution to Islam, with Qataris expressing the strongest opinion (87%).

Majorities in all the Gulf region countries, except Yemen, say that the relations between their country and Iran are negative, including 97% in Saudi Arabia, 83% in Bahrain, and 81% in Qatar. In Yemen, 88% of respondents say their country has positive relations with Iran.

Opinions on whether or not their countries should have closer ties with Iran are decidedly mixed. Majorities in Qatar (69%), Oman (55%), UAE (55%), and Kuwait (52%) say “no,” while a majority in Yemen (79%) and Saudi Arabia (50%) say “yes,” and Bahrainis are evenly split along sectarian lines. While there is an obvious split among Sunni and Shia respondents in UAE and Saudi Arabia on this question, it is significant that 41% of Saudi and 39% of UAE Sunni respondents believe their countries should have closer ties with Iran.

	Disagree	25	8	18	82	8

Majorities of respondents in Lebanon and Iraq agree that “Iranians are good, religious people” (52% and 70%, respectively), “hard-working” (80% and 82%), and “people just like me” (74% and 89%), while majorities of respondents in Jordan and Palestine disagree that “Iranians are good, religious people” (68% and 63%) and “hard-working” (59% and 57%). Jordanians and Palestinians are split, however, on Iranians being “people just like me” with 55% in Jordan agreeing and 51% of those in Palestine disagreeing.

Those in Lebanon and Iraq also say that “Iranians have made a positive contribution to Islam” (83% and 89%, respectively), while majorities in Jordan (65%) and Palestine (75%) disagree.

In terms of relations with Iran, respondents in Lebanon and Iraq are almost unanimous in saying that their relations are positive; and in both countries majorities say they should have even closer ties (Leb: 82%, Iraq: 66%). In Jordan, 83% of respondents say they have negative relations with Iran, and just 26% think Jordan should have closer ties with Iran. In Palestine, opinion is somewhat more mixed with 48% saying their relations with Iran are positive and 46% saying negative; still, 70% do not want closer ties with Iran.

Respondents in Libya are positive across the board, saying “Iranians are good, religious people” (63%), “hard-working” (65%), and “people just like me” (57%). Algerian respondents agree that Iranians are “good, religious people” (61%) and “hard-working” (76%), but two-thirds disagree that Iranians are “people just like me.” The only other positive response is from a majority in Egypt who agree that Iranians are “hard-working” (52%). Majorities in Morocco and Sudan respond negatively to all three questions. Tunisians are negative with respect to Iranians being “good, religious people” and “people just like me,” but are split on how “hard-working” Iranians are.

Majorities in all North African nations except Libya do not think that “Iranians have made a positive contribution to Islam.”

More than three-quarters of respondents in Libya and Algeria say the relations between their country and Iran is positive, and strong majorities (63% and 58%, respectively) want to have closer ties with Iran. Meanwhile majorities in Morocco, Tunisia, Egypt, and Sudan say their relations with Iran are negative, and do not want their countries to have closer ties to Iran.

In Turkey and Azerbaijan, majorities disagree that “Iranians are good, religious people” (75% and 76%, respectively), “hard-working” (72% and 68%), and “people just like me” (78% and 85%). Pakistani respondents are far more positive with 94% saying “Iranians are people just like me” and 64% saying they are “hard-working”; Pakistanis are split on whether Iranians are “good, religious people” (45% agree vs. 49% disagree). While there is no significant sectarian divide in Pakistan or Azerbaijan on these questions, Sunni respondents in Turkey are extremely negative on these questions, while Shia respondents are far more favorable to the Iranian people.

A majority of Pakistani respondents (51%) say “Iranians have made a positive contribution to Islam,” while 91% of Azerbaijanis and 78% of Turks disagree.

There is near unanimity among respondents in Turkey (95%) and Azerbaijan (97%) that the relations between their countries and Iran are negative, while Pakistanis are evenly split on this question (46% positive vs. 48% negative). More than seven in ten respondents in all three non-Arab Muslim neighbors do not want closer ties with Iran. In Pakistan, Shia respondents overwhelmingly (84%) would like to have closer ties, while Sunni respondents strongly disagree (82%).

All the Gulf region nations agree by wide margins that Arab culture is more generous than Iranian culture. Majorities in all countries also agree that Arab culture is more knowledgeable, except in Yemen where 43% say Arab culture is more knowledgeable and 40% say Iranian culture is. In both Yemen and Bahrain, Shia respondents are more likely to say Iranian culture is more knowledgeable (54% and 39%, respectively) than to say Arab culture is (27% and 37%, respectively).

Majorities in Yemen (71%), Saudi Arabia (64%), Oman (57%), and Qatar (54%) say that Arab culture is more grounded in history and civilization; pluralities in Kuwait (47%), UAE (44%), and Bahrain (41%) agree. More than one third of respondents in Bahrain (39%), Kuwait (36%), and UAE (33%) say Iranian culture is more grounded in history and civilization. In Kuwait and Bahrain, Shia and Sunni respondents are divided on this question.

Finally, in all the Gulf region countries surveyed, majorities of respondents say Iranian culture is more violent. Again, in Kuwait, a plurality of Shia respondents (47%) and about a third of Bahraini Shia respondents say Arab culture is more violent.

More than two-thirds of the respondents from the North African countries surveyed say Arab culture is more generous. Majorities in Morocco (70%), Egypt (69%), Sudan (66%), Tunisia (60%), and Algeria (58%) say Arab culture is more knowledgeable. In Libya, 38% say Arab culture is more knowledgeable, while 39% say Arab and Iranian culture are equal. At least two-thirds of respondents in all the countries except Libya say Arab culture is more grounded in history and civilization, while a majority in Libya (52%) says Iranian culture is more grounded in history and civilization. Finally, more than three-quarters of respondents in all the North African nations surveyed except Libya say Iranian culture is more violent. Only 35% of Libyan respondents agree that Iranian culture is more violent, while 37% say Arab culture is more violent and 24% say the two cultures are equally violent.

Majorities in Azerbaijan (85%) and Turkey (77%) believe that Arab culture is more generous; 45% of Pakistani respondents agree, while 41% say Arab and Iranian culture are equally generous. Majorities in all three countries agree that Arab culture is more knowledgeable, that Arab culture is more grounded in history and civilization, and that Iranian culture is more violent.

11. IRAN AS A NUCLEAR POWER

Group I – Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, UAE, KSA, Oman, Yemen

Which of the following statements comes closest to your views?
Table 11	Kuwait	Bahrain	Qatar	UAE	KSA	Oman	Yemen
Statement A: The Middle East would be more secure if it were a nuclear free zone.	97	78	92	80	89	80	33

Table 11	Kuwait Sunni	Kuwait Shia	Bahrain Sunni	Bahrain Shia	Qatar Sunni	UAE Sunni	UAE Shia	KSA Sunni	KSA Shia	Oman Sunni	Oman Shia	Oman Ibadi	Yemen Sunni	Yemen Shia
Statement A: The Middle East would be more secure if it were a nuclear free zone.	100	94	95	63	94	80	82	100	30	96	69	74	41	19
Statement B: The Middle East would be more secure if Iran were a nuclear power.	0	6	3	25	2	12	13	0	61	2	28	13	53	76

More than three-quarters of respondents in Kuwait (97%), Qatar (92%), Saudi Arabia (89%), Oman (80%), UAE (80%), and Bahrain (78%) say that the “Middle East would be more secure if it were a nuclear free zone, while 61% of respondents in Yemen disagree, saying that the “Middle East would be more secure if Iran were a nuclear power.” The Shia respondents in Saudi Arabia and Yemen are alone in favoring Iran becoming a nuclear power (61% and 76%, respectively).

Group II – Lebanon, Iraq, Jordan, Palestine

Which of the following statements comes closest to your views?
Table 11	Lebanon	Iraq	Jordan	Palestine
Statement A: The Middle East would be more secure if it were a nuclear free zone.	70	48	89	79

Table 11	Lebanon Sunni	Lebanon Shia	Lebanon Christian	Iraq Sunni	Iraq Shia
Statement A: The Middle East would be more secure if it were a nuclear free zone.	86	29	91	76	35
Statement B: The Middle East would be more secure if Iran were a nuclear power.	9	67	8	20	63

In Jordan (89%), Palestine (79%), and Lebanon (70%), respondents overwhelmingly feel that the region is more secure without nuclear weapons. In Iraq, however, respondents are evenly split on this question (48% vs. 49%), and this division is largely on sectarian lines with 76% of Sunni respondents siding with a nuclear free zone and 63% of Shia respondents in favor of a nuclear Iran. Two-thirds of Shia respondents in Lebanon also favor Iran becoming a nuclear power, while Lebanese Sunni (86%) and Christians (91%) strongly support a nuclear free Middle East.

Group III – Morocco, Algeria, Libya, Tunisia, Egypt, Sudan

Which of the following statements comes closest to your views?
Table 11	Morocco	Algeria	Libya	Tunisia	Egypt	Sudan
Statement A: The Middle East would be more secure if it were a nuclear free zone.	59	54	38	78	73	73
Statement B: The Middle East would be more secure if Iran were a nuclear power.	41	46	55	18	25	26

A majority of respondents in Tunisia (78%), Egypt (73%), Sudan (73%), Morocco (59%), and Algeria (54%) think that a nuclear free Middle East is more secure, while a majority of Libyan respondents (55%) say Middle East security is better served by a nuclear Iran. In Morocco and Algeria, more than four in ten respondents agree that the Middle East would be more secure if Iran were a nuclear power.

Group IV – Turkey, Pakistan, Azerbaijan

Which of the following statements comes closest to your views?

Statement B: The Middle East would be more secure if Iran were a nuclear power.	6	62	4	45	2	16

More than eight in ten respondents in Azerbaijan (86%), Pakistan (85%), and Turkey (82%) say that the Middle East is more secure without nuclear weapons. A majority of Shia respondents in Turkey (62%), as well as 45% of Shia respondents in Pakistan, feel that the region would be more secure if Iran were a nuclear power.

12. IRAN'S POWER IN THE GULF REGION

Group I – Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, UAE, KSA, Oman, Yemen

	Disagree	93	61	98	34	97	89	85	96	0	96	64	77	46	19

At least two-thirds of respondents in Gulf region countries—with some approaching unanimity (e.g., Kuwait: 98% and Saudi Arabia: 97%)—agree that “Arab Gulf states are right to be concerned with Iran’s nuclear program because this program makes the region less secure.”

About two-thirds or more of respondents in all the Gulf region states except Yemen would not be comfortable with Iran as the dominant power in the Gulf region. In Yemen, 62% of respondents would be comfortable with this. While majorities of the Shia communities in Saudi Arabia (98%), Yemen (80%), and Bahrain (58%) are comfortable with the idea of Iran as the dominant power in their region, only 28% of Shia respondents in Kuwait and 14% of those in UAE feel comfortable with this.

Group II – Lebanon, Iraq, Jordan, Palestine

Agree or disagree with the following statements?

I would be comfortable with Iran as the dominant power in the Gulf region	Agree	58	93	71	6	89
	Disagree	40	6	28	91	8

While respondents in Jordan and Palestine overwhelmingly agree that the Arab Gulf states are right to be concerned with Iran's nuclear program (89% and 83%, respectively), just 18% of Lebanese and 32% of Iraqis express this concern. In Iraq, there is a deep divide between Sunni and Shia on this question with 72% of Iraqi Sunni respondents saying this concern is justified and 83% of Shia respondents saying they disagree.

While 74% in Lebanon and 62% in Iraq are comfortable with Iran as the dominant power in the Gulf region, 91% in Jordan and 84% in Palestine are not comfortable with this notion. Again, Iraqis are deeply divided along sectarian lines.

Group III – Morocco, Algeria, Libya, Tunisia, Egypt, Sudan

Agree or disagree with the following statements?
Table 12		Morocco	Algeria	Libya	Tunisia	Egypt	Sudan
The Arab Gulf states are right to be concerned with Iran's nuclear program because this program only makes the region less secure	Agree	82	63	83	80	73	85

I would be comfortable with Iran as the dominant power in the Gulf region	Agree	27	46	12	15	28	29
	Disagree	73	53	83	82	72	68

Majorities in all the North African countries surveyed agree with the Gulf region states who are concerned with Iran's nuclear program, with the highest level of agreement in Sudan (85%), Libya (83%), and Morocco (82%).

Majorities of respondents in these countries are also uncomfortable with the idea of Iran as the dominant power in the Gulf region. Those in Libya (83%) and Tunisia (82%) are most uncomfortable; however, only 53% of those in Algeria express discomfort with this idea, while 46% of Algerians are comfortable with Iran as the dominant Gulf power.

I would be comfortable with Iran as the dominant power in the Gulf region	Agree	9	54	12	87	2	15
	Disagree	84	37	81	11	97	83

Respondents in Azerbaijan (92%), Turkey (80%), and Pakistan (75%) agree with the concern of Arab Gulf states about Iran’s nuclear program; however, majorities of Shia respondents in Turkey (58%) and Pakistan (67%) disagree with this concern. In Azerbaijan, there is no sectarian division on this question.

At least two-thirds of respondents in Azerbaijan (87%), Turkey (77%), and Pakistan (69%) are not comfortable with Iran as the dominant Gulf power. Again, majorities of Shia in Pakistan (87%) and Turkey (54%) are comfortable with a dominant Iran in the Gulf region, while there is little sectarian division in Azerbaijan.

Statement B: Iran has ambitions to produce nuclear weapons.	77	74	90	57	86	79	70	99	73	90	90	62	68	45

Majorities in all the Gulf region states surveyed believe that “Iran has ambitions to produce nuclear weapons,” with the strongest opinions in Saudi Arabia (95%) and Qatar (84%). Yemeni respondents are the most likely to believe that “Iran is pursuing its nuclear program for peaceful purposes” (36%).

Group II – Lebanon, Iraq, Jordan, Palestine

Which of the following statements comes closest to your views?

Statement A: Iran is pursuing its nuclear program for peaceful purposes.	83	69	86	6	14
Statement B: Iran has ambitions to produce nuclear weapons.	13	31	12	92	82

While those in Palestine (90%), Jordan (87%), and Iraq (85%) overwhelmingly believe that Iran hopes to build nuclear weapons, 80% of Lebanese respondents say that Iran’s nuclear program has only peaceful purposes. Lebanon is the only country of the 20 surveyed where a majority expresses this belief.

Group III – Morocco, Algeria, Libya, Tunisia, Egypt, Sudan

Statement A: Iran is pursuing its nuclear program for peaceful purposes.	32	28	49	17	15	21
Statement B: Iran has ambitions to produce nuclear weapons.	68	71	45	81	85	75

In North Africa, more than two-thirds of respondents in Egypt, Tunisia, Sudan, Algeria, and Morocco believe that Iran has ambitions to produce nuclear weapons. In Libya, opinion is split with 49% saying Iran’s nuclear program is for peaceful purposes and 45% saying Iran wants to produce nuclear weapons.

Majorities of respondents in all the Gulf region states except Yemen support economic sanctions against Iran by the international community if Iran persists with its nuclear program. Saudi Arabia (77%) and Qatar (65%) have the strongest levels of support for sanctions, while the margins are closer in UAE (54% vs. 39%), Bahrain (52% vs. 43%), and Oman (50% vs. 43%). In Yemen, 81% of respondents do not support economic sanctions, while just 18% do support them.

However, less than a third of respondents in all Gulf region countries surveyed agree that the international community should authorize military action if Iran continues to resist. When asked if the international community should do nothing in the face of Iranian resistance to efforts to curb its nuclear program, only a majority in Yemen (81%) agree definitively. On the other hand, respondents disagree with the international community doing nothing in Qatar (73%), Oman (56%), and UAE (55%). Opinion is evenly split in Kuwait (49% vs. 49%), Bahrain (46% vs. 49%), and Saudi Arabia (46% vs. 49%).

With respect to these questions, respondents in Bahrain and Saudi Arabia are deeply divided along sectarian lines, with the Shia community in both countries strongly opposed to sanctions (Bahrain: 75%, Saudi Arabia: 94%), opposed to military action (Bahrain: 96%, Saudi Arabia: 100%), and supportive of the international community doing nothing (Bahrain: 85%, Saudi Arabia: 98%). On the other hand, a majority of Sunni respondents in Bahrain (67%) and Saudi Arabia (76%) would support the authorization of military action by the international community if Iran continues its nuclear program.

If Iran continues to resist efforts, the international community should do nothing	Agree	70	88	79	54	92
	Disagree	26	6	18	45	5

Jordanians and Palestinians are supportive of economic sanctions if Iran persists with its nuclear program (70% and 69%, respectively), while those in Lebanon and Iraq strongly disagree with sanctions (82% and 69%, respectively). Iraqi Sunni respondents, however, strongly support sanctions (78%), while the Iraqi Shia community strongly opposes this strategy (92%).

Military action authorized by the international community is overwhelmingly opposed by those in Lebanon (89%) and Iraq (91%); a majority in Jordan (59%) also opposes a military response. Palestinians are, however, evenly divided on this question (47% vs. 47%).

Respondents in Lebanon and Iraq are in agreement that the international community should do nothing if Iran continues to resist pressure to curb its nuclear program (79% and 80%, respectively), while more than seven in ten respondents in Jordan and Palestine disagree with a do-nothing strategy.

Group III – Morocco, Algeria, Libya, Tunisia, Egypt, Sudan

Agree or disagree with each of the following actions?
Table 14		Morocco	Algeria	Libya	Tunisia	Egypt	Sudan
If Iran persists with nuclear program, international community must apply economic sanctions against Iran	Agree	29	37	29	60	60	62

If Iran continues to resist efforts, the international community should do nothing	Agree	50	60	63	34	34	36
	Disagree	50	38	32	64	65	63

Majorities in Sudan (62%), Egypt (60%), and Tunisia (60%) support economic sanctions, while majorities disagree with this strategy in Morocco (70%), Libya (66%), and Algeria (63%). Military action is, however, opposed by strong majorities in all the North African countries surveyed. Doing nothing is not acceptable to majorities in Egypt (65%), Tunisia (64%), and Sudan (63%), but is considered the correct course by majorities in Libya (63%) and Algeria (60%). Moroccans are split on this question (50% vs. 50%).

If Iran continues to resist efforts, the international community should do nothing	Agree	14	88	32	93	1	23
	Disagree	84	8	62	1	97	75

Respondents in Azerbaijan (77%) and Turkey (68%) are supportive of economic sanctions if Iran persists with its nuclear program. Opinion in Pakistan is divided on this question (49% vs. 45%). In both Pakistan and Turkey, views are divided by sect with the Shia communities strongly opposing sanctions (Turkey: 87%, Pakistan: 86%).

Two-thirds of Pakistani respondents oppose military action if Iran continues to resist, while opinion is split in Azerbaijan (50% support vs. 47% oppose) and Turkey (49% vs. 46%). A majority of Sunni respondents in both Azerbaijan (61%) and Turkey (56%) actually support a military response to continued Iranian resistance.

Finally, a non-response by the international community is opposed by majorities in all three of these non-Arab Muslim neighbors (Azerbaijan: 81%, Turkey: 73%, Pakistan: 52%). Again, these responses are deeply divided along sectarian lines in Turkey and Pakistan; 88% of Turkish Shia respondents and 93% of Pakistani Shia respondents agree with a do-nothing response from the international community.

Majorities in all the Gulf region states surveyed oppose military strikes against Iran's nuclear facilities if authorized by a consensus vote in the United Nations, with the highest level of opposition in Yemen (87%) and Kuwait (82%). The lowest levels of opposition are in Saudi Arabia (60%) and Bahrain (60%), where majorities of Sunni respondents support such strikes (Saudi Arabia: 70%, Bahrain: 75%). The opposition to military strikes by individual countries is even stronger in all countries. The sectarian division is considerably less pronounced in Saudi Arabia (44% of Sunni support) and Bahrain (only 22% of Sunni support) with respect to individual countries' conducting military strikes.

Group II – Lebanon, Iraq, Jordan, Palestine

METHODOLOGY

The approach used for conducting the poll in the 20 Muslim countries involved face to face, in-home personal interviews. Urban as well as rural centres were covered in each country to cover a widespread geography. The sample obtained was nationally representative & comprised adult males and females, who were 15+ years of age (in some GCC countries, only citizens were covered).
